PRESIDENT: Order, order. There has been a considerable amount of agitation and many questions in the House have been asked regarding the Inspectorate. The Government came to the conclusion that certain probationary Inspectors of Police should be appointed and trained and for that purpose wanted a selection to be made. Many officials and many important non-officials have put forward the claims of relations actual and prospective and I have received numerous private letters and given many interviews on that matter. A large number of persons were interviewed by the Public Service Commissioner and the Inspector-General of Police. It was represented to me that that inspection was imperfect and did not give satisfaction. A large number of letters came to me complaining of those inspections. Subsequent to the inspections, dozens of letters came to me from certain officials and many non-officials, complaining that their relations or their prospective relations had not been chosen and should have been chosen. In order to put a quietus to all this and to divert the blame
